Arm Yourself Against Employee Accusations

Small Businesses Lack Basic Protections.

For employers, the workplace is a minefield of risks. The number of employee accusations and charges employers' face has grown dramatically in recent years. New laws have come into play. More are pending. And your exposure begins before you even hire an employee.

A recent survey of small business owners showed that most of them worry about employee claims. Yet many small businesses have few, if any, protections in place to avoid or minimize their risk. Without human resources professionals or legal counsel on staff, they often go without the policies and procedures that can make all the difference.

FROM HIRING TO FIRING – RISKS AT EVERY STAGE

Before Hiring

Your risks begin the moment a candidate applies for a job. Without a thorough written application, you have no proof of treating candidates consistently. Use an application form to get that proof and each applicant's:

- Acknowledgement of at-will employment (giving you the right to end employment)
- Representation that their resume is truthful
- Permission to check credit and other background.

During employment

There are federal, state and local rules and laws employers and employees must follow in every workplace. Most states require them to be in writing. Use an employee handbook to explain your policies and procedures regarding:

- At-will employment

- Family Medical Leave
- Equal Employment Opportunity
- Employing people with disabilities
- Sexual and other harassment
- Reporting and resolving problems
- Pay schedules
- Paid sick days and vacations
- Workers' compensation
- And others

State and local laws requiring sexual harassment training vary. Provide training for all employees regarding harassment and discrimination to reduce your liability.

Termination

Performance-based terminations and lay-offs can trigger claims of unfair treatment. Use regular, written performance appraisals to reduce your risk for performance-based actions.
